It may confidently be expected that the working of these two examinations and of the rules they have given rise to will result in immense benefit to the public service, first by guarding against admission into its lower grades of persons of very inferior or of no qualifications whatever, and, secondly, by ensuring for the higher grades a class of men possessing superior attainments and a greater breadth and depth of knowledge than the Government had been previously content to require from its servants. Among other changes that may be noted in the history of the commission during the last four years is the abolition...
