Characteristics of Professions and Professionals Increasing the authority of teachers has also been a key subject of recent education reform. Indeed, it is fundamental to site-based management, restructuring, and other such reforms designed to decentralize school decisionmaking (Johnson 1990; Ingersoll 1994, 1996b). Two forms of teacher authority are usually highlighted: the influence collectively wielded by faculties over school policymaking and the individual autonomy exercised by teachers over planning and teaching in their classrooms. Both are deemed of importance. Advocates of increases in faculty influence and increases in teacher autonomy argue that teachers will not only make better informed decisions about education issues than district or state officials, but that top-down decisionmaking often fails precisely because it lacks the support of those who are responsible for the implementation and success of the decisions. In short, reformers have argued that teachers cannot be expected to be highly committed to school decisions over which they have had no say (Shedd and Bacharach 1991; Conley and Cooper 1991; McNeil 1988). Compensation Professionals are typically well-compensated and are provided with relatively high salary and benefit levels throughout the career span (Hodson and Sullivan 1995). The assumption is that, given the complexity of the knowledge and skills required, relatively high levels of compensation are necessary to recruit and retain capable and motivated individuals (Etzioni 1969; Hodson and Sullivan...
