Not illustrated. 1922 Excerpt: . . . if he does, it is to say, with all due deference to Sorel, that Bergson is a bourgeois and a Christer! As for the practical accomplishment of Russian Bolshevism, it finds its condemnation in this fragment from Sorel which I will quote in full although it is a trifle long: I call attention to the danger which revolutions, produced in an era of economic decay, present for the future of a civilization. All Marxians do not seem to have paid due attention to Marx's ideas on this subject. He thought that the great catastrophe would be preceded by a terrible economic crisis; but we must not confuse the crisis Marx had in mind with any form of disintegration. Crises seem to him the result of a too daring adventure in production which has created productive agencies out of proportion to the automatic regulating methods at the disposal of capital. Such an adventure takes for granted that the future be regarded as promising for the most powerful capitalistic enterprises, and that confidence in a coming period of economic expansion be absolutely preponderant at the time in question. For the middle classes, who may still find existence possible under the capitalist regime, to venture joining in revolt with the proletariat, prospects of production must seem to them as brilliant as the conquest of America must have seemed to the English peasants who left ancient Europe to hurl themselves into a life of danger in the new world. We...
