A decisive influence is also exercised by the water used in the reeling, which, however, does not remain the same throughout the year, but is altered in its composition by dry periods on the one hand, and heavy rains on the other, and accordingly dissolves the sericin more or less. (Chemical corrections have proved useless till now, according to my experience.) Of course, it would be the best thing to employ distilled water, if it were not too expensive in Italy, which has no cheap coal; the cost would amount to one lire per kilo--about nine cents per pound, and Italian reelers do not gain enough to be able to support this difference, as we shall see in the Fourteenth and...
