Excerpt: . CHAPTER V HOME AND SCHOOL Of course the Prussian schoolmasters know all this and deplore it. Dr. Boehm of Berlin, whom I have quoted already,1 says it would follow as a natural consequence from the recent abolition of the Leaving Certificate (Abschlussprüfung) at the end of the sixth year that no boy should enter a Higher school with nine classes unless he has at least the intention of going on to the end, and unless his talents and circumstances in life justify him in proposing to do so. So far as he is personally concerned, Dr. Boehm is strongly in favour of the proposal made by several educational authorities not to grant the privilege of one year's service as a volunteer to pupils of the Higher schools until they get their Certificate of Maturity, except in exceptional circumstances. He says, however, that...
