Neuware - Diploma Thesis from the year 1997 in the subject Computer Science - Applied, grade: 1,0, University of Koblenz-Landau (Unbekannt), language: English, abstract: Inhaltsangabe:Abstract: The use of formal methods in the area of software specification is a subject of current software engineering research and becoming increasingly accepted by a larger audience in the computer science community. However, the specification of telecommunication networks is mainly based on weakly formalized paradigms that rely on natural-language descriptions of the behaviour of network components. The research focus of the GDMO project, in the context of which this paper originates, was the introduction of elements of formal specification into such specification methods. This paper explores procedures to translate specifications in the semi-formal network component specification formalism GDMO (Guidelines for the Definition of Managed Objects), defined and standardized by ITU and ISO, into ZEST, an object-oriented extension of the formal Z specification language. It also contains an illustrative case study of the translation of an application-sized GDMO specification into ZEST.
